The Honorable Ajit Pai
Chairman
Federal Communications Commission
445 12th Street, SW

Dear Chairman Pai:

I write to emphasize the importance of the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) final rules for the reverse auction of remaining funds under the Connect America Fund (CAF). As a senior member serving on the Senate Commerce Committee I have been following this issue. More importantly, it is vital that the rules for the auction ensure my rural constituents in Missouri have the same access to advanced broadband networks enjoyed in urban areas.

FCC rules for the reverse auction of remaining CAF funds will dictate the federal government's ability to support broadband in unserved areas of Missouri over the next 10 years. A coalition of rural stakeholders, including the Missouri Electrical Cooperatives, NTCA – the Rural Broadband Association, and the Utilities Technology Council, have submitted a joint proposal to the Commission regarding weighting criteria and independent evaluation of bids for the CAF auction. I believe the proposal is sound and represents the best way to ensure all broadband technologies can competitively bid.

I have serious concerns with weighting proposals that favor slower speeds. Rules that favor slower speeds will result in a lack of competition in the auction and will cost the federal government more money over the long term. If Missouri cooperatives can competitively bid, they have the economies of scope and scale to reach households, businesses, schools, and hospitals with lasting broadband service. Any weighting criteria that excludes or discourages cooperatives from bidding means my rural Missouri will be unnecessarily relegated to slower speeds, and the FCC will have lost a tremendous opportunity to advance broadband nationwide.

Broadband access in rural Missouri that is comparable to urban areas is essential to the statutory requirement of universal service. CAF auction rules that allow cooperatives to bid competitively in order to close the rural-urban divide is the right way to proceed.

Sincerely,

Roy Blunt
United States Senator
